

The future of fertility

Today, more employers are considering fertility coverage as a part of standard health benefits. While the standard services provided by your health plan are a starting point, they may not be complete enough for your population. Providing comprehensive access to fertility care has advantages for both you and your employees, and it can be offered at relatively low costs.

Without access to proper coverage, employee knowledge and care may suffer—and uneducated care decisions can result in poor cycle management, heightened stress and increased costs.

Example: Inadequate fertility coverage can have significant costs, both visible and hidden. Without coverage, it's common for patients to spend upwards of $50,000 on fertility treatment.⁴ Financial stress can cause an employee to lose a month of productivity in a year.⁵

More than half of patients with no coverage resort to using their credit cards or 401K to pay out of pocket—creating financial fragility.⁴
